In August, I posted an article examining the need to design apps for the classroom. I suggested that there are a number of ways that apps could be used to achieve the goals of the classroom. Since then, the iPad has gotten a little bit bigger and the marketplace of apps has grown tremendously. The choices are infinite. And, I've seen many attempts at apps that are designed as a "replacement" for working with the traditional whiteboard. Unfortunately, these apps have issues that have been reported that limit their potential. For example, I don't know about you, but when I use an app to take notes on the whiteboard, I want to be able to see what I've written. Furthermore, I rarely have any real reason to move 1cb139a0ed
