The company expects developers to build virtual-reality games and other applications for the headsets that will take advantage of the technology. The present disclosure is related to the field of radiation oncology, in particular, to the control of radiation sources in radiation therapy. Radiation therapy, in particular stereotactic body radiation therapy (SBRT) has become increasingly common, leading to the need to improve the accuracy and precision of radiation targeting. In the treatment of cancer, radiation is used to selectively destroy cancerous tissue while avoiding damage to adjacent normal tissue. In SBRT, a patient is positioned in a treatment room or treatment volume with a targeting system. The target is typically within the body or contains a tumor or tissue region of interest in the body. The treatment volume is a space or site within the patient, such as a tumor or organ. Thus, a patient is positioned such that a tumor or an organ of interest is within the treatment volume. During radiation treatment, the positioning system localizes the position of the tumor or organ in the patient to allow for accurate radiation delivery.
