Field of the Invention This invention relates to methods for the treatment of various skin disorders and skin diseases such as dermatitis, psoriasis, exudative or chronic hyperplastic dermatitis, atopic dermatitis, eczema, or the like. More specifically, this invention relates to a composition and method for the treatment of such skin disorders and diseases using a combination of an anti-inflammatory and a mast cell stabilizer. 2. Prior Art Various conditions and diseases of the skin and mucous membranes have been treated by the application of medicaments, such as ointments or solutions, to the skin or mucous membranes. Such treatments are especially useful for relief of the discomfort of dry skin or for the treatment of irritating dermatoses, such as dermatitis and psoriasis, and for the control of skin ulcers and malignant skin conditions. There are many compositions available for the treatment of such conditions. However, most of these are relatively complicated or in some instances involve the use of a number of components which are difficult to formulate or require the use of toxic materials. Other compositions are complex to use and often have a limited shelf-life. An example of such compositions is the combination of cyclosporine, vitamin B12 and hyaluronic acid as disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,554,697. While the composition disclosed in this reference is relatively simple to use, it is quite expensive due to the use of hyaluronic acid. A commercially available composition in which the cyclosporine and vitamin B12 are combined with hyaluronic acid is marketed under the trademark LIDOXY.RTM. and has a shelf life of about one year. The cyclosporine and vitamin B12 must be kept separate from one another until immediately prior to use, and this is difficult to manage. Despite the numerous compositions and methods available to the public for the treatment of the various skin conditions and diseases, there remains a need for simple and cost effective compositions and methods for the treatment of such conditions and diseases. The present invention provides a composition and method for the treatment of various skin disorders and diseases such as dermatitis, psoriasis, exudative or chronic hyperplastic dermatitis, atopic dermatitis, eczema,
