February 11, 2012 2 The Pressure of Growth on the Periphery Although emerging economies are undergoing very rapid economic growth, some "cold" statistics reveal that the expansion has not been that rapid for a great number of countries that are located in Africa and Asia. These countries are not looking for "crisis", and they are not in the risk of experiencing a radical fall of their gross domestic product. When people talk about "crisis", of course, they refer to the crisis of economic crisis, the collapse of local industrial capacities, which, in most cases, can be cured quickly, since these countries have enough industrial capacity and have the potential to "rejuvenate". In general, "cold" data on the economic growth of a country are revealed from short-term statistics with a long series, expressed in terms of real GDP, industrial and industrial production, industrial production, foreign trade, among others. In short, the short-term statistics, and the long series, reveal the growth of the macro economy, but they do not reveal the growth of the micro economy. Why "cold" data on the growth of an economy does not show the actual efficiency of the country to grow and how much it has been expanded? When we talk about "growth", we are referring to changes in the size of the economy, but there are other indicators, such as the quality of life. So, when we talk about growth of an economy, what is revealed is the "growth" of the economy that is equivalent to the "growth" of the capital in an economy. It represents the growth of the same economy that increases the efficiency of the real economy. However, "cold" data on growth may be misleading. It is not a matter of quality of life but of the size of the economy. Suppose that a country undergoes "cold" data on GDP growth, we may think that the growth of GDP was positive or negative. Then, the data reveals the size of the economy; in other words, it provides no information about the growth of the quality of life in the country. So
