“Getting the feel of true player movement has been at the top of our list of things to do since we first started development back in June of last year, and it’s come to fruition today with the release of FIFA 22,” said Aaron McNeill, Head of Pro Game AI. “I’m thrilled to be able to offer our fans a more authentic experience of football on the pitch, and I’m equally thrilled to know that in the end we’ll be able to help to alleviate some of the burden on the human performance team when it comes to our players.” As a result of this work, it’s often possible to see players significantly benefiting from the changes, not only in terms of their comfort levels but also in terms of their effectiveness and performance. It’s also the first release that has been tailored to the needs of human players, rather than for human players. “With players in motion, we had to ensure that the technology doesn’t get in the way of the player’s tactical thought,” said Paul Caiazzo, FIFA Lead Multiplayer Engineer. “We have made improvements to the ability to move through tactical situations and also to move in and out of positions, which makes it easier for human players to think about their next move. We’ve also worked to allow human players to seek defensive cover from the moment they take possession of the ball and determine the best tactical options, and this also means that they don’t need to check back with AI all of the time.” FIFA Insider's Threat Assessment Guide Tested - Get the latest intel on how to get the best results in FIFA '20's new Defending AI

Human Off-the-Ball Play AI Off-the-Ball players will now take into account more than just their position on the pitch. For example, they will be more aware of how the ball is behaving around them, and will adjust their decision making accordingly. This means that each player will think tactically, off the ball, in order to move in the most advantageous position and time their sprints accordingly. “We’ve given human players the tools to think more tactically and off-the-ball,” said Dan Smith, Technical Director, Video Productions. “With movements being recorded and used in tandem with machine learning in FIFA 22,

The representation of space in the brain. The representation of the physical world in the brain is the result of the interaction between the senses and representations of the external world stored in sensory and motor cortices, and brain regions subserving the processing of spatial information: navigation, memory and attention. In this review, we examine the effects of spatially biased sensory input on these representations, focusing on studies in rodents and non-human primates. When sensory input to the right hemisphere is biased towards the ipsilateral side, the region of primary somatosensory cortex devoted to the ipsilateral side responds more strongly and allocates more attentional resources to the contralateral side. This can be reversed by altering the spatial properties of sensory input, which restores the sensory-to-somatomotor (SM) ratio of the hemisphere. The biasing effect disappears when sensory input from the contralateral side is increased.
