Native Americans used to play a game called Fox and Box with the Native Americans in order to teach them how to throw and hunt foxes, teach them how to resist being captured and teach them how to remove the spears from the game. The Native Americans made the game more addictive by adding other tribes to the competition. Because of this, the game was very addictive and was played very often. The name of the game is Fox and Box or Fox and Box. It is played by Native American tribes and is usually played in teams. Native American tribes who play the game of fox and box are composed of men, women and children. In the game, foxes are hunted or captured. The Fox is often captured by sneaking around in the woods and hiding behind bushes. The players then attempt to get the fox out of the game and place it in a box. The team that places the fox in the box and the team that does not place it in the box are eliminated from the game. The more foxes the team catches, the closer to being eliminated the team becomes.
