As an exercise in understanding finite differences, I recently have come across a problem like below: If $y(x) = x - 1$, then $\frac{dy}{dx} = \left(\begin{array}{cc} 1 & -1 \\ 0 & 1 \end{array} \right)$ and $D^2y = \left(\begin{array}{cc} 2 & -2 \\ 0 & 2 \end{array} \right)$.

of GPS? Wrong, wrong, wrong. There is so much to learn from the development and impact of Radio Controlled Electromagnetic Navigation as a means of telling large off-road vehicles where they are. I have written many, many times about the revolution in off-road navigation enabled by RCE, from the StuntCar and SuperCar/Tourist Car to the Wild Car and MiniVette. Today's GTX class vehicles are only re-inventions or evolutionary variations on the principles and applications of RCE. We have studied, and learned about, a number of navigation and navigating systems. We have written a lot about the StuntCar, Shelby MOve, Lazy Daze systems, the Tele Atlas concept for the Wild Car, the GM Horizon system, and a few others. What has not, in my opinion, been discussed is the self nature and evolution of RCE navigation. As I see it, it has impacted the world of both racing and off road driving more in the last two years than it has in the 40+ years since its inception. I think we can now probably say that the days of GPS are numbered for off road navigation. In the beginning there were a few alternatives to the car computerized position mapping we know today. Yes, it was all mapped, but it was bar-coded. Any car could have the code, called a FreeMark, copied to a hand held computer, called a Palm Pilot (), and used for navigation. IT was not terribly expensive, typically $25 to $35 US dollars in the early days, and free for the user. This concept has now been copied and used in Spyside Choppers, light Dodge 350 Super Cars, and even many Golfs and Honda/Acuras. The fact that it was free to the user, the fact that it was and is still very accurate and easy to use, and the fact that it was uncoupled from the car helped it catch on fast. Think of it this way, drivers of light off-road vehicles are now much more likely to have really good location on the power. Assuming they don't screw things up. With the passage of the Open TXO/TTM programs years ago that allowed the computer onboard such drivers to become a GPS receiver, the combination of low cost, accuracy and the wide-spread of the system made GPS IMMENSE in the ability to help off-road drivers,
