Every day you wake up you can see climate change already beginning to create more challenges, changing our lives and our communities. But some climate experts say we're already seeing the first signs of the unprecedented changes we're going to be dealing with. In the coming decades, climate change is going to disrupt more than our food, water, and health, threatening our very lives. It will degrade ecosystems and natural systems. That's why it's important that you understand the basics of climate change, so you can protect yourself and know what to do when a climate-related emergency presents itself. In preparation for this growing challenge, the Union of Concerned Scientists is now offering a free online class, "How Do I Know When It's a Good Day for Climate Change?". The class teaches people how to read climate change news, understand the effects of climate change and develop a plan for making positive changes in our daily lives to try to minimize the harm caused by climate change. The class runs from October 4-15, and is open to the public. It's free to take, but you' b7e8fdf5c8
