The European Parliament elections are just around the corner, and the anxiety among the mainstream parties to capture these 'precious' seats has reached unprecedented levels. In Greece, the story of the far-right extremist party Golden Dawn is instructive. Although the party does not currently hold a seat in the Greek parliament, it has held seats in the European Parliament, and performed surprisingly well in European parliamentary elections. However, the party's popularity seems to be steadily dropping, and the final effort to capture one or more MEP seats in the elections are likely to fail. This is the result of the party's practice of attacking migrants and immigrants, and the resulting media coverage of these attacks. A survey of the Greek media showed that after the first round of the European elections, an overwhelming majority of the media coverage of the elections centered on the Golden Dawn. In fact, the party's unusual and menacing behavior is often the only subject covered in the mainstream media. The attacks on migrants and immigrants are barely mentioned, though the party's long-standing practice of attacking migrants and immigrants is hard to dismiss. The common media story is that Golden Dawn is a rising party. Although it does not currently hold a seat in the Greek parliament, the party is projected to reach nearly 10% of the vote in the European Parliament elections. This level of success has captivated mainstream media and even left-leaning voters, who seem quite afraid of the success of Golden Dawn, and are confident that the government will govern the country fairly and rationally until the next election. The reality is quite different, as the recent survey by the Greek newspaper Efimerida Ton Syntakton shows. When we asked what the major topic of coverage in these elections was in the press, 72% mentioned the Golden Dawn party, with another 10% mentioning local candidates, the movement "Rai" (Strong), and the Popular Orthodox Rally movement. In other words, the Golden Dawn's success is the major topic. An overwhelming majority of respondents did not mention migrant violence or attacks. Another interesting result in this survey is that the Golden Dawn, despite their recent success in the European elections, has the lowest approval rating of any political party. Although the PASOK party has always been the party with the highest approval rating in Greece, with nearly 40% approval in the latest survey, the Golden Dawn has almost 30% disapproval. Only the conservative party LAOS has a higher disapproval level than Golden Dawn. The findings of the survey shed a different light on
