These articles are available in different shapes and sizes and generally comprise a tampon pledget, also called the absorbent element, enclosed in a wrapper. The wrapper is used for receiving and holding the pledget in the proper orientation to provide proper insertion and use of the pledget. The pledget is normally an assembly of superabsorbent fibers. When such a pledget is used for feminine hygiene, for instance in an article having a pointed end, the pointed end is used for insertion. A wrapper can serve as a form for holding the pledget in place prior to use. There is a potential in an absorbent product with an applicator such as a wrapper having tear and/or pull characteristics that would provide a user with a smooth and easy method for opening the wrapper that would encourage retention of the wrapper and the pledget therein. The various elements of a wrapper can be thermoplastic materials and thermoplastic materials are preferred for their processability and the ability to provide the desired strength, such as in end of wrapper sealing, within a wide variety of constraints. For instance, it is desirable that the wrapper be able to maintain the pledget in a dry environment, particularly when the pledget is unsuperheated. In addition, a wrapper should be able to provide an intact wrap that maintains the pledget in the proper orientation to provide for proper insertion and subsequent removal of the pledget. Wrappers for disposable absorbent articles provide a barrier that protects the product from degradation by moisture. This is particularly desirable for absorbent articles that are disposed of in the toilet. This barrier, however, must be sufficiently rigid to permit its installation and use. This is particularly the case when the absorbent article is a tampon because the barrier must be able to both hold the tampon in place and maintain the pledget in the proper orientation. In addition, the barrier can and should be opaque to shield the consumer from the pledget and to protect the pledget from Suffering Together Many years ago, my dad often watched baseball games on the family's old black-and-white tv, usually the Yankees, sometimes the Dodgers, and always the Phillies. Once, the broadcast was interrupted by a report on a hijacking at a Philadelphia airport. As my parents recall, the announcer said, "There are hostages in the terminal." Stirred, my dad asked, "What do you mean by hostages?" The announcer replied, "The hijackers are demanding that the airlines turn over $10 million in cash." My dad stopped watching the baseball game, turned off the tv, and started rummaging through his desk.

After a few minutes he emerged holding a wad of bills, which he handed to my mother. "Here," he said, "give the airlines the cash they're being asked for." I'd like to say that this story ended happily, but that's not really true. Two years later, he was diagnosed with cancer. For the first couple years he only suffered in silence. He was a WWII veteran and former school teacher and, although he was college educated, he had no formal training in dealing with cancer. He had no doctor or nurse to answer questions and no oncologist to explain his condition. He just stopped eating for days, slept, and gradually grew weaker. In the beginning, my mother's periodic visits home from work provided a link to the rest of the world. Her job was to plan trips and arrange for the children and the house to be filled with visitors. When I was younger, she often invited people from church or community organizations who, she hoped, might provide some positive impact on my dad's spirit. Sometimes, she arranged for a family friend or a neighbor to come, thinking this would cheer him up. People always stopped by. They brought cookies, candy, or cold drinks, and they would chatter about how my dad had looked, whether he was eating, what their own plans for the week were. But visits were mostly silent; except for a few, my parents were hard to talk to about anything but superficialities. 6d1f23a050
