Search form Main menu You are here Department News A success story, whatever you measure it by, to be told and retold. A journal that serves as a vehicle for academic self-expression, cross-fertilization and critical debate. Those are some of the hallmarks of the Pennsylvania Journal of Applied Technology as it celebrated its 40th anniversary at the Technology Showcase held in Philadelphia, PA. As fall progresses, we begin to discuss ways to clear the darkness of winter. One of the very first items on the clearing agenda should be an update to the archive. One of the first things lost in the darkness of winter is the beautiful faces that make up the community of people who have found that technology holds the key to turning theory and practical efforts to a profession and to a vocation. A year ago, I was on a panel with several other people who discussed the future of technology education in high school classrooms. The panel was sponsored by the Pew Charitable Trusts and was titled, "Kids in the Driver's Seat." The general topic of the panel was, "How can we use technology in high school to improve student outcomes?" The balance of the panel was critical in being clear about the reality of technology in our lives. The reality is that technology is ubiquitous and will be the primary mode of access, communication, learning, and much of the work of all
