endoscopic approaches. Between September 2004 and September 2009, 16 patients (7 females and 9 males) with superior vena cava obstruction were treated by non-endoscopic surgery. Indications for operation included direct superior vena cava occlusion (1 case), thrombus formation (10 cases) and phlebothrombotic occlusion (5 cases). Eleven patients were diagnosed as secondary to jugular vein compression (1 case of Paget's disease of sternum, 6 cases of jugular phlebitis, and 4 cases of osteoid osteoma). Three patients had multiple thromboembolic events. The main symptom was prolonged swelling of arm. The signs included redness of hand (8 cases), cyanosis of hand (11 cases), edema of face (11 cases), and edema of arm (15 cases). All the patients underwent surgery with onestage operation, thoracic approach and cervical approach. The duration of operation ranged from 55 to 120 minutes. The mean follow-up time was 19 months (10-31 months). All patients were cured. One patient died 4 hours after operation. Eight patients experienced lymphorrhea (1 case of preoperative lymphorrhea), two patients had short-term subcutaneous lymphoid reaction. But there was no case of long-term or permanent complications such as fistula formation or dissection. Two patients experienced severe hemorrhage. One patient occurred right arm blood loss of about 1500 ml, and the blood vessel clamp was not successful, then we should clamp the brachial artery. The other patient was operated at same time after 6-hour, but the blood loss was only 400 ml, and the blood vessel clamp was not successful. Nonendoscopic operation for superior vena cava obstruction is a safe and effective approach to the superior vena cava obstruction. { "images": [ { "filename": "ic movie white 36pt.png", "idiom": "universal", "scale": "1x" }, { "filename": "ic movie white 36pt 2x.
