To assess the effect of donor's birth characteristics, maternal parity and cord blood (CB) characteristics on the number of nucleated cells obtained after nucleated cell (NC) collection and the percentage of CD34+ cells collected. A retrospective study of data from 725 deliveries, with an attempt to identify associations between the variables and the NC and CD34+ counts. Significant associations were found between NC counts and maternal weight, parity and mode of delivery. Mean NC count per 100 g was $3.61 \times 10(9)$ for primiparous mothers and $3.65 \times 10(9)$ for multiparous mothers. The maximum NC count was obtained from mothers who were delivered vaginally and with a birth weight of at least 4000 g. Parity and the mode of delivery were associated with the percentage of CD34+ cells in CB. The maximum CD34+ yield was found in samples with a birth weight of 3500 g and in cesarean sections. The delivery characteristics that were significantly associated with higher NC and CD34+ counts in CB include a higher maternal weight and a higher birth weight, both as a measure of fetal condition. The parity and the mode of delivery appear to affect the percentage of nucleated cells and CD34+ cells in CB samples. Endocardial thrombi and vasospasm following coronary artery bypass surgery. We describe a 46-year-old female patient who showed extensive coronary arterial thromboses and vasospasm, with a subsequent catastrophic course, after coronary artery bypass surgery. This occurred despite vigorous anti-platelet therapy. In a review of our experience with 615 patients who underwent coronary artery bypass surgery from 1978 to 1991, vasospasm and/or thrombi in the proximal graft anastomotic sites were observed in 10 patients (1.6%). This study demonstrates the possibility of occurrence of extensive thrombi and vasospasm in the proximal arterial anastomotic sites following coronary artery bypass surgery.Phase 1 trial of GD2/CD30/IL-2 Immunotherapy in patients with stage
