I wrote a C++ function that in-turn calls all the functions available in the current directory and below it. Is there any way to get the list of the functions/functions to execute? A: The answer by Mr. Stranger works perfectly for Linux systems, where this information is stored in the ELF symbol table. When working on Windows, you should rather use the Stack Sampling DLL: The Stack Sampling DLL (the filename is kernel32.dll on 64-bit Windows) allows you to determine the functions that called functions or variables with a particular storage class. A: For Windows, you should use SymTab. In the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, where quiet roads lead to deserted streets and tiny shop-fronts leading to single family homes, comes a narrow road off a derelict track. It is completely off the beaten track. There is little sign that it exists. There is no indication that this is the home of one of the most renowned and prolific graphic artists in the country, David Marshall. Many visitors will never get to see this little road before they leave, but many others will want to see more of the work he is doing. On a damp November day, I took a road that very few have ever seen, an unassuming road leading to a single-wide trailer home, nestled in the woods. I rang the bell, but it was not a homecoming or a welcoming of a new arrival. It was the sound of a click, that all visitors to this site can often hear, that announces that you are at the best place to find out who David Marshall is, and what he has been up to since his last major exhibition in London in 1999. I have met him before, but on this occasion he was most gracious in welcoming me and my Canon camera into the modest confines of his home studio. It is a place that he lives in with his wife Christine, who is his business partner and best friend, and with his six year old son Daniel
